After 4 years as Chief Executive of the organisation, Tim Boyes-Watson will be leaving in December to become Director of MANGO, an international aid and development charity.

Tim has led Learning South West through a period of substantial growth in income, numbers of staff and impact. The strategy has been driven by what young people and adult learners have told us about their need for inspirational learning and youth work. The key challenge has been to answer the question:

“Where does good practice come from?”

Learning South West has focused on being a catalyst for collaboration between professionals and organisations to jointly develop good practice. We have also helped enable young people and adult learners to have a voice and influence in shaping provision, for example through hosting the South West UK Youth Parliament.

The Board of Trustees is looking for a visionary and determined leader with strong specialist expertise and business skills to continue to grow the organisation and build its reputation and role in influencing policy and practice, regionally and nationally.
